Read the passage below and answer the questions that follow:

Love and hatred are often regarded as polar opposites, but they have a complicated and intertwined relationship. Both feelings originate from deep-seated emotions and enormous emotional support. While individuals make emotional investments in relationships, the intensity of their love can, on occasion, rework into hatred, particularly when expectations are unmet or trust is breached. This phenomenon underscores the thin line between love and hatred, suggesting that the transition between these emotions is far from truthful. One primary purpose for the near interrelationship between love and hatred is that each feeling requires a considerable amount of strength and consciousness. The passion that fuels love can quickly change into resentment, while the item of love causes pain or sadness. Mental research advises that the same areas of the brain that are activated with the aid of love are also stimulated by emotions of hatred. This overlap suggests that the two emotions aren't as disparate as typically believed.
